

IMMENSE LOCOMOTIVE AND TRAIN OF CARS IN ROCK FORMATION

Recently some voyagers descending the Green river in Utah were struck with the amazing resemblance of a huge rock formation, silhouetted against the sky, to an enormous locomotive and train of cars. This they immediately named "The Aztec Express" and took a photograph, which is reproduced here. "The Aztec Express" may not have equalled in speed, comfort and safety "The Scenic Limited" of today, but in its time no doubt was the banner flyer of the Aztec race, says the Denver Republican.

It is more than probable that very few people, though living here in the west, know that flowing through that portion of the country but recently known as the Great American desert is a large stream of water, navigable all the year round for a distance of more than 140 miles. This river, the Green, uniting with the Grand, forms the great Colorado. Numerous gasoline launches are in operation between Green River station, on the main line of the Denver & Rio Grande railroad, and some copper properties being developed some fifty miles south of there, and there was built during the past season a double-deck steamboat over 100 feet long and with a carrying capacity of more than fifty people. It is anticipated that this steamer will be in service next season and furnish transportation facilities for tourists desiring to visit the upper cataract of the Colorado, a distance approximately 150 miles south of Green River station.

"The Aztec Express," the Oldest Train in America.

"HUMAN NATURE" (WITH A DIFFERENCE.)

(Atlanta Constitution.)
"Here's a story of a man that stole a whole bank."
"Human nature!"
"An' a man that married seven women an' they all a-livin'."
"Human nature!"
"And while I'm about it, I might as well tell you that one of yer mules is stole—likewise the heaver hat you bought to go to meetin' Sunday."
"The devil you say! Oh, the villain of men! Oh, the wretched human creature goin' roun' on two legs!"

VALUABLE DISCOVERY.

California Man Smelts Steel From Iron Ore With Oil.

(San Francisco Chronicle.)
John Potter, one time furnaceman and steelworker for Andrew Carnegie, now a resident of Los Angeles, has discovered a new process for the production of steel.
By the magic of the oil blast he has evolved a smelter which brings a stream of molten steel from a furnace filled with iron ore such as the California hills produce.
This is the most far-reaching step ever made in the production of any metal in the United States, if not in the world. Behind it lies more than a quarter of a century of patient experimenting, sometimes with a grain of success; more often with nothing but unvarying failure staring him in the face. And now he is writing the second chapter in the history of the most useful metal on earth—a metal whose beginnings date from the coming to the new world of those few European puddlers and furnacemen who made the foundations for the Carnegie and the Schwab and the Frick and the Corey millions.
His chapter is already well begun; it lies in a 280-pound ingot and other products of steel down in a dingy little laboratory at the plant of the California Industrial company on Fourth street in this city. It is a very ordinary accumulation of steel to all appearances, but a very marvelous inasmuch as it is the only similar pile in the world. It has never been outside of California. The ore from which it was smelted came from low-grade deposits of iron in San Bernardino and other near-by counties of southern California. The oil used in smelting it was produced right here in the state. It is black, low-grade stuff, of perhaps 14 degrees gravity, good for little save burning beneath boilers and similar poorly paid uses until Potter got hold of it. But the most wonderful thing about this collection of pure steel remains to be told. The ingot never saw coke or coal, or the inside of a blast furnace; never went through a Bessemer converter or open hearth process; in fact, its production quite upset all the old-established modes followed hitherto in the yet it is good steel; no better comes from the smelters of Pittsburgh, from Erie or from Youngstown.

This is enough to make any steel man sit up and take notice. But it is not quite enough for the layman unversed in the way of blast furnaces and rolling mills; for him there must be huge buildings and vast volumes of smoke rolling from tall chimneys, the red light of the open furnace doors painting the evening sky a deep crimson, else there can be no reality to the steel works of his dreams.
